Happy New Year!

It's 2017 and the month of January is always a chance for a new beginning. Popular New Year's resolutions include goals for weight loss, smoking cessation, job searches, personal success, etc...January is a time for us to say, "out with the old and in with the new!"

Too often, society and the media encourages people to focus on selfish goals of attaining money, beauty, or popularity. What if our resolutions focused on more intangible goals?

I challenge you to construct your New Year's resolutions for 2017 on time and service to friends and family. In the rat race we call life we become to focused on work or personal success and often loose focus on what we are working for? Why do we want success at work? Why do we need to loose weight in order to focus on our health? Why do we want less stress? Why do we want to save more money? What are your answers to these questions? For many if not most people the root answer to these questions has something to do with taking care of their families and the ability to spend more time with people who make them happy. Set aside the round about resolutions and do just that. Commit to doing your husband's laundry without complaining or picking up your grand children from practice. Resolve to leave work early every Tuesday in order to eat a sit down meal with your family. Take that trip to Florida to visit your children or grandchildren. Play that game of Bingo with your friends on Sunday and resolve to laugh....a lot! Design your resolutions to fit your actual goals of happiness and spending more quality time with the people who matter, the people you have worked your entire lives to care for and protect. Design your resolutions around positive experiences with loved ones and achieve the true happiness we are all searching for!

Warmest Regards,

Corey Strauch
